

What will you collect?

The immediacy of the situation makes it hard to do appraisal on the spot. There is a good argument about taking everything at first and do the appraisal at a later time.

The question of what to collect will always be determined by practicalities around space and cost, as well as the long-term conservation prospect. These things impact how much we can keep.

What if someone wants something back? These objects are left as offerings. Will you have some sort of time frame in which time people can take things back?

Emotional pressure can have an impact on professional decisions. Is this a good thing?